

Indian reservations in northeast Washington were reduced dramatically as homesteaders pressed for farmland. The Colville reservation north of Spokane was moved west almost immediately after settlers protested. Later it was cut in half when gold was discovered near Republic. Indians today retain only the southern half. The Moses reservation was abolished after seven years and its residents moved to Colville.

Judy Stanley / Seattle Times